Ethnic and Religious Identities in Israel

Instructor: Professor Harvey Goldberg

Course Description

Israel is a society that grew largely on the basis of immigrant populations of various backgrounds from Europe, the Middle East, and elsewhere. The immigrants brought with them different languages, cultures, and political ideologies. After the state was established, there was some hope that this would result in a national amalgam, but the immigrants interacted with the veteran population and its institutions, and with one another, in a variety of ways that produced its current multicultural texture. The course will discuss the history of immigration, the various policies of immigrant settlement, the way that the social sciences conceptualized and studies immigration, and the ongoing debates about culture and identity. Special attention will be paid to the interaction between identities defined by ethnicity and those growing out of diverse religious experiences and ideologies, including how emerging differences have made an impact upon and are contested within the Israeli public sphere today.
